PALERMO: RESTORING THE CITY CENTRE – PLANNING AND POLICIES

<sup>1</sup>Affiliation: Architect, Full Professor of Urban Design and Head of C.I.R.C.E.S. (Interdepartmental Centre for Research on Historical City Centres) - University of Palermo, Italy, E-mail: terecann@unipa.it; <sup>2</sup>Manfredi Leone: Architect, PhD in Sustainable Urban Development, University of Rome Three. Landscape Architecture Researcher and Adjuncted Professor, University of Palermo, Italy, E-mail: manfredi.leone@unipa.it

Objectives

The article describes the restoration process of Palermo's historical centre. The process has been discontinuous and fragmented, so that presently, extremely degraded urban areas still coexist with highly desirable areas characterized by first-rate restoration.

Identity

Palermo is often considered the grand capital of the Mediterranean. It is, however, more similar to a Middle Eastern than European city. It has its own unique historical and cultural identity, which is the product of the marriage between the dominant noble culture and the popular traditions.

The large historical centre (250 ha) is full of important architecture that still suffers the ravages of World War II and decades of culpable neglect.

The official urban plan (PRG 1956-62), drawn up when members of the local mafia held seats in the city government, called for the destruction and almost total reconstruction of the urban fabric. This project was not adopted because the construction business, almost always controlled by the mafia, found it more cost-effective to operate in the sparsely populated but expanding areas. Meanwhile, however, the earthquake of 1968 and the continuing departure of the residents brought about the depopulation and decline, still visible today.

Methods

It was only during the late 1980s, with the election of mayor Leoluca Orlando, which marked a major break with the past, that the necessary town planning tools (the Operational Detailed Plan, and the appointment of consultants Pierluigi Cervellati and Leonardo Benevolo) to launch the redevelopment of the historical centre were set up. A regional law also ensured funds were allocated to public and private operators (1993).

The successive municipal public policies, however, showed fluctuations and shortages of various kinds in connection with the difficulty of mobilizing an adequate number of individuals, the magnitude of the degradation, the complexities of the projects and the enormity of the centre.

Results

However, despite everything, the restoration process is under way and there have been numerous and very significant public renovation projects, such as places for cultural activities, museums, offices, as well as the redevelopment of the waterfront, which has allowed Palermo to reclaim its identity as a coastal city. The restoration for residential purposes has brought about gentrification to many areas greatly increasing property values and created conflict between the residents and entertainment and tourist sectors.

In the third millennium, the permanence of the city's culturally inadequate and ineffective centre-right government has considerably slowed the recovery process, and the majority of the projects are devoted to converting heritage buildings into luxury hotels.

Conclusions

Palermo's experience with urban revitalization and development of an impoverished historical city centre demonstrates the need for urban planning that is systematically supported by effective public policies and that never loses sight of preserving the soul of the city.
